With simple random sampling, each individual in the population has an equal chance of being selected for the sample. The four steps of simple random sampling are (1) defining the population, (2) constructing a list of all members, (3) drawing the sample, and (4) contacting the members of the sample.

Step 1. Defining the Population Step 2. Constructing a

STATISTICAL METHODS. 4 By extension to the median, the sample p percentile (say 25th percentile for example) is the sample value at or below which $p\%$ (25%) of the sample values lie. If there is no value at a specific percentile, the average between the upper and lower closest existing round percentile is used.

It represents the number of elements existing in the population for each element of the sample. 2. Sampling factor: it is the quotient between the size of the sample and the size of the population, n/N . If this quotient is multiplied by 100, we get the percentage of the population represented in the sample.

One easy design is "simple random sampling." For instance, to draw a simple random sample of 100 units, choose one unit at random from the frame; put this unit into the sample; choose another unit at random from the remaining ones in the frame; and so forth. Keep going until 100 units have been chosen.

Salant and Dilman, describe, that the statistics based on samples drawn from the same population always vary from each other (and from the true population value) simply because of chance.
